my experience with the OSSma
video production team

During the whole day of working with the production team (Rosie, Charlotte, Mark, Craig in pretty sure but it has been a few days) I was able to learn and improve certain skills as well as grow an understanding of what goes into making a professional video.

While setting up and filming the communication scene I would often see the team checking and evaluating the original story board. A story board is a detailed description and layout of how the video is going to be once finished with times, sound effects or visuals as well as generic images from the internet to show what sort of Angls or shots they would need to take. On the topic of ~~cameras~~ cameras, Mark and Craig often took many different versions of each scene but with different camera angles or changes in lighting to try and get the best looking ~~flow~~ flow of ~~or~~ different scenes. They would also communicate and voice their opinions on which would be a better fit as well as asking for both my opinion ~~as well~~ and the other pupils involved making everyone feel welcome.

In the duration of the whole day, Rosie and Charlotte in particular made the video fun to both watch and act in by setting up activities like thinking of unique jobs as well as asking us interesting questions. However the highlight of my day was during the aspiration scene as I was personally allowed to roll the camera to get a nice smooth finish on the end of the video. We had to film that scene multiple times to get the prices speeds with the help of Mark and with
